"... Let the little children come to Me ..."

Getting The School Year Started

There are plenty of benefits of preschool - it can be a great place for kids to interact with peers and to learn valuable life lessons. But going to preschool does come with its fair share of emotions, for both the parent and the child. For a kid, entering a new environment filled with teachers and children can cause both anxiety and anticipation. For parents, there may be mixed emotions over whether the child is ready for preschool. The more comfortable you are about your decision the fewer problems you - and your little one - will encounter. To ease your child's fears: (1)Spend time talking with your child about preschool even before it starts. Before the first day, introduce your child to activities that often take place in a classroom (2) Visit the preschool classroom to ease the entrance into the new environment. While you're in the classroom, let your child explore the class in his or her own way. The idea is to familiarize your child with the classroom and to let him or her get comfortable. You can also use this time to ask your child's new teacher how she handles the first tear-filled days. How will the first week be structured to make the transition smooth for your child? Although it's necessary for you to acknowledge the important step your child is taking and to provide support, too much emphasis on the change may just make your child's anxiety worse. Young kids can pick up on their parents' nonverbal cues. If you feel guilty or worried about leaving your child at school, he or she will probably sense that. The more calm and assured you are about your choice to send your child to preschool, the more confident your child will be.
